Notes for Hugh Christopher Thomson

BIOGRAPHY: "Thomson, Hugh Christopher, businessman, printer, journalist, politician, office holder, JP, and militia officer; b. 1791 in Kingston (Ont.), son of Archibald Thomson and Elizabeth McKay; d. there 23 April 1834. Hugh Christopher Thomson's father emigrated from Scotland to Tyron County, N. Y., in 1773 and during the American revolution served under Joseph Brant [Thayendanegea]. By the late 1780s the family had settled in Kingston, where Archibald, a master carpenter, contracted to build a house for Sir John Johnson and also undertook the construction of the first St George's (Anglican) Church. The Thomsons moved to Newark (Niagara-on-the-Lake) in 1794 or 1795 and thence to York. Around 1807 young Hugh became a clerk in the general store of Laurent Quetton St George in York. Soon afterwards he assumed responsibility for the Niagara branch of the business, and in 1810 he was transferred to Kingston. His correspondence with his employer from 1808 to 1815 throws light on the business methods of the time and reveals his integrity of character. When St George returned to France in 1815, Thomson bought the Kingston store and soon afterwards formed a partnership with George H. Detlor. Two years earlier, he had been involved with Joseph Forsyth, John Kirby, and other merchants in the creation of a Kingston banking association. On 18 Sept. 1813 Thomson married Elizabeth Spafford, who died of a 'lingering illness' less than a year later at the age of 22. His own poor health kept him from active service during the War of 1812. He married his second wife Elizabeth Ruttan of Adolphustown on 18 March 1816. They were to have ten children, only three of whom would survive infancy or early childhood. A man of many interests, Thomson was active in the community. He was a justice of the peace, a militia officer, a warden of St George's Church, secretary of the Midland District Agricultural Society, and deputy crown clerk and commissioner of the Court of Requests for the district. He was also a freemason, an officer of the Kingston Emigration Society, Treasurer of the Midland School Society, and a generous subscriber to the Kingston Auxiliary Bible and Common Prayer Book Society. In 1819 Thomson wound up his mercantile business to become proprietor and editor of the 'Upper Canada Herald', a weekly journal which began publication that September as a rival of the 'Kingston Chronicle', published by John Macaulay and Alexander Pringle. By the mid 1820s the 'Herald' had the largest circulation of any Upper Canadian Newspaper, and in 1826 William Lyon Mackenzie described it as 'perhaps the most consistent, temperate, and useful periodical work in the Province.' In addition to producing his newspaper, Thomson did job printing and published a score or more of pamphlets, annual reports, and tracts, as well as two slim volumes of verse and some full-length books, including 'St. Ursula's convent, or the nun of Canada, containing scenes from real life' (2v., 1824) by Julia Catheline Hart [Beckwith], the first novel written by a native Canadian and the first to be published in what is now Canada. In 1828 there appeared 'A manual of parliamentary practice . . . , compiled, edited, and published by Thomson. In point of fact it was a plagiarized reprint of Thomas Jefferson's volume of the same title (1801) omitting references to American law and history, and, where practice differed, substituting Canadian for American legislative procedures. Jointly with James MacFarlane, who took over the Chronicle in 1824, Thomson also published 'The statutes of the province of Upper Canada . . . (1831), a compendium of all statutes passed in the province since 1793. Although the Herald was independent politically - Thomson described it as being 'loyal and patriotic, open to all parties, but under the control of none' - it did not support moderate reform measures. The Herald gave its backing to reform agitation of Robert Gourlay and in the 1820s it supported the two leading reformers in the eastern section of the province, Barnabas Bidwell and his son Marshall Spring Bidwell. Thomson's first brush with authority came in 1823 as a result of publishing a letter to the editor (probably written by Thomas Dalton) which criticized a report of a legislative committee on settling the affairs of the 'pretended' Bank of Upper Canada, or, as the writer said, on unsettling its affairs. This article was held to be in contempt of the privileges of the House of Assembly, and Thomson, as publisher, was summoned to appear before the bar of the house, where he was sternly reprimanded by Speaker Levius Peters Sherwood for printing a 'false, scandalous, and malicious libel.' This rebuke by a member of the tory elite may have influenced Thomson's decision to stand as a moderate reformer in the general election of 1824. In this contest he headed the polls as one of the two members of Frontenac County, and he repeated the performance in the elections of 1828 and 1830. Sherwood's reprimand may also explain why Thomson rushed to champion liberty of the press in a special issue of the Herald when, in 1826, Mackenzie's printing-office was raided by a gang of young Tories led by Samuel Peters Jarvis. Similarly, in 1828 he protested the severity of the sentence accorded Francis Collins of the 'Canadian Freeman' for his alleged libels on John Beverley Robinson and Christopher Alexander Hagerman. But Thomson drew a fine line between liberty and licence, and when Mackenzie overstepped the mark he lost Thomson's support. During his ten years in the legislature Thomson won a reputation as a fair-minded and judicious committee-man but he was neither a fluent nor a frequent debater on the floor of the house. Probably because of his experience in business and his grasp of financial issues, he was appointed to many committees dealing with money matters. When investigating pork imports in 1826 he found Lieutenant Governor Sir Peregrine Maitland guilty of exceeding his authority in allowing the importation of American pork by two prominent Tories, James Gray Bethune and Peter Robinson. For making this accusation public in the Herald, he was indicted at Maitland's insistence as 'a malicious and evil-disposed person' who sought to bring the lieutenant governor into 'great and public hatred, contempt, and disgrace.' The case was quietly dropped by Attorney General Robinson when Maitland left the province. From 1824 to 1830 Thomson sided with the forces of moderate reform in the assembly, opposing the Church of England's monopoly of the clergy reserves and attacking the government's stand in the alien controversy. In the autumn of 1827 he became a friend of John Walpole Willis, sent out from England to fill a vacancy on the Court of King's Bench. When Maitland dismissed Willis for declaring that the court could not sit in the absence of Chief Justice William Campbell, reformers of every stripe protested. Thomson published Willis's lengthy defence 'in toto' and deplored the action of the executive as a fatal blow to the judicial independence of our Provincial Courts.' The Chronicle retorted that Willis was 'wrong headed' and 'weak-minded' in trying to halt the judicial process on a 'dubious technicality.' The affair blew over when Willis returned to England, but it helped to ensure a reform majority in the general election of 1828. After 1830 Thomson abandoned his reform allies and became a consistent supporter of the administration. The change in his political allegiance reflected the admiration of many reformers for Maitland's successor, Sir John Colborne. It also reflected the strains imposed on the reform movement by the election of Mackenzie in 1828. After taking his seat in the house Mackenzie tended to dominate the debates, and his radicalism combined with his incivility quickly antagonized some of the more moderate reform members, including Thomson. Openly critical of his colleague, Thomson voted with the Tories against some of Mackenzie's measures, an action for which he was denounced by Mackenzie in the 'Colonial Advocate' but applauded by the Chronicle; the later paper offered him the olive branch and welcomed him back 'within the pale of civilized society.' In December 1831 Thomson seconded a motion by James Hunter Samson to expel Mackenzie for a double libel on the executive branch and the assembly. With biting sarcasm, Mackenzie railed at him for ranging himself among the persecutors of the Press.' Yet Thomson's opposition to Mackenzie was not volte-face on his part; he was exercising the same independent judgement for which, in 1825, he had been presented in Kingston with a silver cup by 'the friends of free discussion' (one of whom was the engraver of the cup, Samuel Oliver Tazewell). Thomson's greatest political achievement was the establishment of the provincial penitentiary in Kingston. He moved the first resolution of this subject in 1826, but no action was taken until Colborne adverted to the matter in his address to parliament in 1830. Thomson was then made chairman of the new committee, whose preliminary report was unanimously adopted. In 1832 he and John Macaulay were appointed commissioners to visit American penal institutions, procure plans, and submit an estimate of costs. Early in 1833 their detailed report was adopted and 12,500 pounds was voted over a period of three years to buy land and erect a building. Having made himself an expert on penitentiary theory and operation, Thomson supervised the first stages of construction and drew up a comprehensive act for the administration and maintenance of the institution. Had his life not been cut short, he probably would have become the first warden of the penitentiary. Never a man of robust health, Thomson was in York for a sitting of the assembly in late December 1833 when he suffered a haemorrhage of the lungs. His wife's brother-in-law Robert Stanton sat up with him one night during his illness, explaining to their common friend John Macaulay that 'he seems low spirited & dejected unless some old acquaintance is near him.' Treated by doctors John Rolph and John King, Thomson managed to rally, and when navigation opened in April he was taken to Kingston. There he suffered a relapse and died on St George's Day. His brother Edward William, who was with him at the end, wrote that 'he died the death of a Christian without moving a finger and praising God to the last.' In writing his obituary, James MacFarlane, his one-time antagonist at the Chronicle, extolled his devotion to public duty, deplored the calumnies he had had to endure, and said that in private life he was 'universally esteemed.' He was, MacFarlane noted, 'a warm and faithful friend' an obliging and kind neighbour, and a most affectionate husband and father.' His widow, Elizabeth, applied for and received from the provincial government a grant of 100 pounds in recognition of his services. In 1824 she managed the Herald during her husband's absence in York, thus becoming the first woman in the province to publish a newspaper, and upon his death she again took over the paper and carried it on until 1837. daughter in Pontiac, and two sons Christopher and Joseph, reside here. Mr. Ruttan came to Sanilac in 1869, and there he owned several farms. In April 1881, he moved to Dakota territory, now North and South Dakota where he took up two claims, a homestead and a tree claim, which were very fine land, but he was not satisfied, he wanted to be where there was timber and game. In September 1882 he returned to Mescosta and April of the next year located in Clearwater township, where he resided until 1898, when he became mentally deranged and in October was taken to the asylum at Traverse City, where he died. He funeral was preached September 3, by rev. Richard Tower in the Methodist Church, ripid City, and was largely attended. He was laid to rest in Clearwater cemetery." (cited in V. W. Ruttan, 1991).

BIOGRAPHICAL NOTE: "The most complete single source of information available to us about Joseph Ruttan is from his obituary. Joseph Ruttan's headstone at the Clearwater Township Cemetery also carries the dates 1820-1906. Joseph's obituary identifies his birthplace as Adolphustown, Ontario. Family tradition also refers to Bellville, Ontario as Joseph's birthplace. He was a second generation descendent of one of the three loyalist brothers from New Jersey who settled in Adolphustown, Ontario in the mid-1780's. We also have a limited amount of information about Joseph Ruttan and his family from Huron County (Ontario), Sanilac County (Michigan), Aurora County (South Dakota), and Kalkaska County (Michigan). The earliest definitive information we have about Joseph is from the 1861 Canada West Census (Public Archives of Canada, 1861 Canada West Census. Huron County, Turnburg Township, Enumeration District 2, page 6, film C-1037). The Census shows a Jospheh Ruttan (age 41) and his wife Susan (age 40). It lists his occupation as farmer and his religion as Methodist. Family tradition locates the farm near teaswater. the Census indicates that the family lived in a log house. Five children were listed: David Ruttan (16); Ruth Ann (14); Amos (11); Elizabeth (9); and Hulda (6). There is some ambiguity about the names. Jospheh's oldest son James (1841 -) who would have been twenty years old is not mentioned. Ruth Ann's names is spelled Ruthann and is listed as male. Hulda's name is spelled Huda and is also listed as male. The Turnbury Township census also shows (page 11) a Samuel and Susan Walker with a daughter Elizabeth (age 19). This is probably the Elizabeth Walker who became Joseph's second wife in 1864. There is a family story about Joseph's marriage to Elizabeth. apparently the parents objected to the young man that she planned to marry before the family emigrated from Ireland. when she was forced to accept their wishes Elizabeth announced that she would marry the next man who asked her -- regardless of her parents wishes. When Joseph heard the story he asked her to marry him. She accepted.

NOTE: "Letter from Marjorie Ruttan (September 10, 1964), Jospheh Ruttan and his son James both owned farms near Deckerville in Sanilac County Michigan. Joseph moved to Michigan from Teeswater, Bruce County, Ontario, 1869." (Ruttan, 1991 p.134).
